ABSTRACT

This manual was developed by the Office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense as a guide for vocational counselors, employers, and others concerned with the employment of veterans. Military jobs in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Air Force are listed and tabbed separately for each service. Highly related and substantially related civilian jobs are presented together with the military job descriptions in a 3-column format. Included with each job listing are: (1) the number of weeks required for entry level job training, and (2) occupational codes, with the specialty ratings. A separate section lists civilian job categories alphabetically, giving related military specialities for each category. Tabbed indexes are included separately for each service. Instructions for use of the manual are detailed, noting that combat related jobs are not separately listed. Jobs for each military service except the Navy are grouped in these eight categories: (1) electronic equipment repairmen, (2) communications and intelligence specialists, (3) medical and dental specialists, (4) other technical and allied specialists, (5) administrative specialists and clerks, (6) electrical and mechanical equipment repairmen, (7) craftsmen, and (8) service and supply handlers. FOREWORD

This manual is designed to help employers and others interested in making maximum use in civilian jobs of the skills acquired by enlisted personnel during their military tours of duty.

As a direct consequence of military experience, every veteran makes a better employee. All former service personnel have learned to cooperate with others and to understand the responsibility of a job. They bring to their job discipline, emotional maturity and stability, and potential leadership qualifications.

Today's military forces are complex organizations requiring large numbers of highly skilled personnel. The quality and scope of the training given by the Armed Forces are scarcely equaled elsewhere. A very large proportion of the skills acquired by military personnel is directly useful on civilian jobs.

In any labor market, the former service personnel provide a premium resource as potential employees. Maximum utilization of this resource will benefit the employer and help the nation benefit from the fuller utilization of military trained, competent manpower.

HOW TO USE THIS MANUAL

This manual consists of several pages of explanatory material and three "working" sections:

Section 1. Military Jobs and Comparable Civilian Jobs

This section lists the military jobs in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps and Air Force and comparable civilian jobs. The jobs for each service are shown in a separate section for each military service. The subsections are separated by tab sheets labeled Army, Navy, Marine Corps and Air Force, as appropriate. Included with each job listing is a short description of the job duties and the specialty (MOS, Rating, AFSC code for the job). For each job class for which entry level skill training is given the number of weeks of such training is noted in parentheses. The jobs for each military service except the Navy are grouped within eight major categories:

1. Electronic Equipment Repairman
2. Communications and Intelligence Specialists
3. Medical and Dental Specialists
4. Other Technical and Allied Specialists
5. Administrative Specialists and Clerks
6. Electrical/Mechanical Equipment Repairmen
7. Craftsmen
8. Service and Supply Handlers

These categories are described in the Department of Defense publication entitled Occupational Conversion Table, 1312.1-E.

As noted on page ix, combat type jobs (Infantry, Gun Crews and Seamanship Specialists) have not been separately listed in this manual.

Navy jobs are listed alphabetically by Rating.

Section 2. Civilian Job Categories and Related Military Jobs

This section lists common civilian job categories and the military jobs which are related to them. The left hand column of the listing specifies the civilian job category. The other columns give the related job categories in each service.

Section 3. Index

The index is organized alphabetically by military job title, separately for each service in Section 1. No index is provided for the civilian to military comparisons in Section 2. The index gives the page on which the job is listed in Section 1. The index for each service is tabbed on blue sheets, appropriately labeled.

> An employer or other individual desiring to place a veteran, using his military skill and knowing his military job title should first look up the job in the Index and then refer to the appropriate page in Section 1.
> An employer with a specific job to fill and interested in hiring a veteran with an appropriate skill should turn to Section 2, select the job category most closely related to his vacancy and find the list of comparable military skills.

Military Job Titles

Army and Marine Corps occupations are called Military Occupational Specialties, abbreviated MOS. Each MOS has a number. For example, an Army Procurement Sergeant has 76N as his MOS, a Marine Air Freight Transportation Clerk has 3122 as his MOS.

Navy occupations are called Ratings. Example, the Electronics Technician (ET) rating. Some Navy personnel may also carry a numerical designation in addition to their ratings. This designation called a Navy Enlisted Classification (NEC) indicates that the individual has certain specialized training or experience in addition to his basic rating. For example, an ET 1596 is specifically qualified to repair Special Fixed Communications equipment in addition to his basic electronic skills.

Air Force occupations are called Air Force Specialties (AFS). A man's skill category is usually referred to as AFSC, which is the abbreviation for the numerical Air Force Specialty Code. For example, AFSC 916X0 identifies a Cardiopulmonary Laboratory Specialist.

In this manual many of the occupational codes, particularly those in the Air Force, contain the letter X. The X is used to signify that several numbers are used in that position in the code and are all related to the civilian job given. The specific number used in the X position may identify skill level or specialization within the job class.

Introduction and Technical Notes

This manual represents a pioneering effort to relate military to civilian job skills for the job categories of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps and Air Force. It is hoped that the manual will prove useful to civilian employers and others interested in making maximum use of the wide range of talents and skills possessed by men and women who have completed one or more tours of enlisted military service.

Classification Problem

Although military and civilian job classification systems have existed side by side for many years, there have been few efforts to relate these in any systematic manner. There have been many reasons for this. A major one has been the lack of a single generally accepted civilian job classification system.

The four military services also use different systems as do such government agencies as the Department of Labor, the Bureau of the Census and the National Science Foundation. Probably the most important reason for the lack of effort in developing a comparability table has been the technical difficulty of developing one which could stand strong critical evaluation.

The problem in a broad sense is one of classification in general rather than occupational classification alone. All classification systems categorize related, but not identical, items under common headings. All classification systems represent compromises. Let us, for example, look at the problem of classifying a collection of written material as a book. What characteristics identify a book? Do we include only printed volumes? Is there a page limitation? A size limitation? Must a book be bound or can the various pages be clipped or tied together? A dictionary doesn't really help. For example, Webster's New World Dictionary gives the following explanation:

"1. A number of sheets of paper, parchment, etc., with writing or printing on them, fastened together along one edge, usually between protective covers; literary or scientific work, anthology, etc., distinguished by length and form from a magazine, tract, etc.

"2. A number of blank sheets fastened together in a similar way."

Classifying the jobs people perform raises the same kinds of definitional questions. Does an electrician work on house wiring or motor repair, telephone circuits, television repair, all or only some of these?

There is, of course, no clear, simple or unique answer to these questions. The composite of duties and tasks an individual may be called on to perform is a function of many factors. The place he works, his total workload, his personal capabilities, the number and skills of his colleagues, etc.

In the military situation, the duties included in any one job category may differ significantly from those in the typical civilian situation, if such a typical situation in fact exists. More relevant perhaps is the fact that for many military jobs the duties are quite similar to those in a comparable civilian situation.

This manual, while recognizing the many current classification systems, such as DOT, Census, etc., was aimed primarily at the employer as a direct, simple system to help him meet his employee requirements by using skills gained by individuals who served in the armed forces.

The Veteran as a Desirable Employee

Most young men enter military service at some time between their 18th and 20th years and stay for two to four years. Typically, they come in fresh from high school or as high school dropouts -- they are young, immature, have little practical knowledge about the world of work and about getting along in a situation which requires cooperative efforts toward a common goal.

The new recruit enters basic training and begins a socializing process which continues through his military career. The recruit training program of each military service teaches men how to live in a group situation. The programs develop habits of cleanliness, habits of punctuality, and the understanding that all individual effort must be directed toward the common goal.

After recruit training most of the young men are sent to a technical school where they acquire the basics of a skilled occupation. Those young men who go directly into the operating forces are taught their military duties through on-the-job training. Each of these training methods produce an individual who is skilled in his job and most importantly understands how to work with his fellowman.

The military services have a long tradition requiring individual discipline. This discipline goes well beyond the fundamental concept of obedience to orders. It includes development within the individual of those habits and attitudes which are necessary to assure prompt and official completion of assigned tasks and the successful pursuit of individual careers.

The man who completes his tour of military services is different from the youngster who entered recruit training. He is a much more mature individual. His adjustments to the military situation and the need to define his personal goals have brought him to the point where his life's work has become very important to him. He is ready to take on the full responsibilities as a civilian member of society, including the very important task of becoming a working adult.

Before a man leaves military service, he receives vocational counseling and frequently training for a civilian job. Through the TRANSITION Program, which provides the counseling and training, he is helped to establish a link with the civilian job market. Employers desiring to recruit competent manpower for their businesses are urged to contact the TRANSITION project officer at any military installation.

The veteran returning to civilian life is eager to establish himself, to prove his value to a potential employer, to marry, and to get the benefits successful careers offer. The employer making an effort to provide a job for this veteran is making a wise choice in terms of his own business and building on the solid manpower base developed through the training provided by the military services.

Combat Skills

In preparation of this manual a decision was made not to indicate specific civilian jobs related to those jobs generally referred to as "combat" skills. Included in this category are skills whose primary utilization in the military services is infantryman, machine gunner, parachutist, drill instructor, task crewman, gunner's mate, boatswain's mate and the like.

Each of these skills has to varying degrees application to civilian jobs. Organizations needing guards and other security personnel have traditionally recruited skilled combat personnel. Many of the skills of a Navy boatswain are applicable to longshoreman and other jobs in civilian maritime trades. However, the most useful training combat personnel receive in the military is that of being able to work in cooperation with his fellowman, loyalty to his organization, and observance of rules, regulations and procedures needed to "get the job done." A fuller discussion of this point is given under the title, "The Veteran as a Desirable Employee" on page viii.
